Discussion Questions

Ryan begins the conversation with a really simple, yet complicated question: what are people longing to go back to in their lives and in their experience with community?

Quincy named the time we're experiencing during COVID-19 as disruption rather than interruption, and he also acknowledges that our longing for the way things used to be is rooted in the disruption of our identity. How has your identity or how you see yourself been disrupted by COVID-19?

While many of our physical church spaces remain closed, how have you seen opportunities to broaden what you deem to be a sacred space?

How has this wilderness experience enabled you to find a new way of being with God and your community?

Patrick asked a really important question about our participation in the life of the church: How are we being better representatives of Christ by making sure the barriers that existed between us before COVID-19 have been torn down throughout this wilderness experience?

Has this wilderness experience created a sense of social bond for your community of faith? Why or why not?
