Reading In Place
The Bible, Identity, and Social Location

Biblical interpretation is deeply social and contextual. Biblical interpretation is also an act of power. How can we practice biblical interpretation in more responsible and transformative ways? What hermeneutical resources can we employ in order to fully articulate one’s voice(s) in solidarity with others? In the end, who are we—who am I—that interpret the Bible? This short course aims to explore these questions and to cultivate more diverse perspectives in biblical interpretation.

Course instructor

Donghyun Jeong completed his PhD program at Emory University (Religion/New Testament). Since then, he has had opportunities to teach at Candler School of Theology, several churches, and continuing education programs. His publications have appeared in many academic journals, including the Journal of Biblical Literature and Novum Testamentum. As a candidate for ordained ministry (PCUSA), he enjoys building bridges between faith communities and the academy.
